

Happy Death Day Review

A review on this thrilling movie

by Jefferson Martinez

Happy Death Day is out. For those people who like suspense and terror movies, I really do recommend this one.

This movie was released by Universal Pictures on Friday, October 13th, and it has racked up over $70 million dollars worldwide. While it has received a 68% on Rotten Tomato, the movie itself is exceptional.

The plot follows college student Theresa Gelbman (Jessica Rothe) as she is murdered on her birthday. The dead Theresa wakes up to realize that she is reliving her birthday. This makes her go through a type of trauma. She realizes that the only way out of this situation is to find who the killer is by reliving the same moment over in order to save herself.

Happy Death Day was a good movie on both ends. The horror and suspense of the movie was good throughout and the comedy in the characters made the movie a fun one to see. Universal Pictures did the movie well combining the plot with suspense and comedy, it usually doesn't work but it was a hit with this movie. My rating for Happy Death Day would be a solid 86%.

Another good movie to go see is Lionsgate's Only The Brave based on the elite group of firefighters that died while battling the Yarnell Hill Wild Fire in Yarnell, Arizona in June 2013.

Brendan "Donut" McDonough (Miles Teller) is looking for a decent job to support his new born girl after getting bailed out of jail.

He wants to give her what he never had as a child. He decides to apply for the Granite Mountain Hotshot Firefighters.

Eric Marsh (Josh Brolin), leader of the fire fighting squad, teaches him a life lesson of overcoming the past and to be brave to whatever the future may bring.

Marsh then becomes a really good friend of McDonough's family. The relationship between these two was really good. They would work together and they would have long talks

On June 28, 2013 the wildfire became a serious problem in the city, and leader Eric Marsh decides to leave "Donut" out of the mission since he is still inexperienced in his job.

The movie is really good and it will be one of the hits of the year. I give Only the Brave a 96%.
